MISCELLANEOUS READING. A SAD MISTAKE.

A young man of this city was betrother to a beautiful young lady to whom he had been paying his addresses for more than its years, and for whom he entertained the mass sincere affection. This young gentleman was possessed of no small share of manly grade and personal attraction, and in addition to a fine form, intellectual countenance and and blue eyes, could boast of a luxuriant bears This masculine florescense had been allowed to attain its full length and beauty, and also flourished upon the upper lip in a manus: that excited the envy of all his male friends and called forth exclamations of admiration from the majority of the ladies. But strange to say, the lady whom he was soon to lead to the altar, the light of his heart, the apple of his eye, conceived a violent antipathy for the facial growth which excited such admiration in others, and entertaining the notion that his appearance would be much more hearable and less bearish without the flowing beard and luxuriant mustache, demanded on pain of her serious displeasure, that they be at once removed. Willing to sacrifice his own taste to the wishes of his lady-love, the young man, with many sighs, submitted his face to the ruthless hands of a skilful barber, and 400 was speedily shorn of that which had so long 5,500 been his pride; and to be thanked for his was speedily shorn of that which had so long 100 are 10,000 | really most immense self-abnegation, the most shiney-faced youth presented himself the following morning to his affianced one, in expectation of rapturous approval. But no! not a hit of it! When he was nahered into her presence, instead of his smilling reward, the idol of his heart absoluter,
